

Water, People, and the Message in the Bottle

Water is part of most environments, even if it is just the little rain that falls on a desert. Bodies of water--including rivers, lakes, streams, ponds, seas, and oceans--are environments in themselves. Plants and animals live in them.

Water and the things that live in water are important to people. Ever since people have made homes, they have tried to find places near water to make them in.

List three reasons why people would want to live near water.

Most of the big cities on Earth are near rivers, oceans, or lakes.

Here are three water in history projects.

Use a map of the United States to find ten cities that are near rivers or lakes. List them. Leave your list with this page so that other people can see if they can find different one. Then write an answer to this questions: Why are rivers an important part of the history of the United States?

Use a map of Egypt to find the big cities there. What are the most of them near? Why might they all have been built there?

Think of a message that might have been put in a bottle long ago in history. Bottles can float for many miles across oceans. Write the words that someone in early America or ancient Egypt might have put into a message about living near a river or near the ocean. Pretend that you are that person, living long ago. What would you have said to people living today?

This project was funded in part by a grant from the National Endowment for the Humanities. Copyright 1979, Shedd Aquarium